YOU CAN'T WIN!

As soon as the girls of Tucker High saw Wilson Sommers, they knew there'd be trouble. He was slick looking, clever, and awfully smart. Right after he moved to town and entered High School, he made the football team, the dramatic club, and was elected president of the junior class. He changed the class colors, rewrote the class song. Well, no one was too upset until the junior spring dance came along. Since way back in grandma's time, that dance was a long-skirt, bow-tie shindig. Wilson had other ideas. He called a meeting a month before the dance.

"Look, Dames and Squires," he started, "just because grandma and grandpa dressed up for the spring dance, doesn't mean we of the class of '48 have to."

The girls protested! The boys grinned. Wilson was clever. "Think it over," he told them and walked off dramatically.

Ann and Gert, two of the slickest chicks in Tucker High, got their heads together.

"Gert, it's time we gals put a stop to all this Wilsonism," Ann said.

"Reet! Let's call a meeting of the girls and form an iron curtain," Gert answered with enthusiasm.

Before the girls had the meeting, an ultimatum was issued by the boys. It was tacked up on the junior bulletin board. There was no mistaking Wilson's clever touch.

> DAMES AND SQUIRES!
> We, the men of the junior class of Tucker High, refuse to wear the funeral black and white of the spring dance. For the sake of posterity, we will wear what is at hand: colored ties, socks and sweaters we received from Kriss Kringle. The girls are urged to wear the short dress of the day and not the floor-cleaners that stylists have patterned for them.

The school buzzed all day. Boys grinned and refused to talk about it. The girls preened for the fight and that evening they had their meeting in Ann's basement.

"Let's wear our long dresses anyway," Shirley spoke up. She was Wilson's date. All the girls looked at her. "Don't look at me that way," she told them. "I don't know any more than you do. Wilson just won't talk about it."

"She's right," Ann told the girls. "My date is Wilson's best friend, Lucky, and he just laughs at me."

All the girls agreed that the junior men were all the same on this deal—pitted against them, dying to wear old school clothes, itching to outdo them.

"I've got an idea!" Ann was excited "Listen, we'll . . ."

She told them her plan. The basement shook with laughter.

"What's going on down here?" Ann's father came down the stairs. "We can't hear ourselves think."

"We're going to foil the boys' plan, Pop!" Ann answered. "We've got 'em this time and we're going to teach them a lesson, but we're not telling any males. This is for females only."

"Wa-al, if you can beat the junior boys, you're smarter than your mothers." He laughed.

The next day there was another sign alongside the boys' ultimatum.

> SQUIRES—HEAR YE, HEAR YE!
> We accept your ultimatum but we wish to add a line. For posterity, we've agreed that boys should not call for girls just because grandpa did. We'll meet you, properly attired, in the school gym at 8 PM.

The battle reached major proportions. Mothers kept the girls' secret from fathers; dressmakers and shopkeepers were sworn to secrecy. Who would win—the girls of Tucker High or Wilson and his henchmen?

"Come on, what's cooking?" Wilson cajoled Shirley.

"Nothing, Wilson, nothing at all," she answered innocently.

"Oh, yeah? You gals got something up your sleeves!"

The junior boys were discouraged. Not one could edge the secret out of his girl.

"They probably won't be there," Bud said forlornly. "We'll get dressed up and have to dance together."

"I know they're up to something corny," Lucky added.

Bud continued, "We'll be the laughing stock of Tuckerville! It'll go down in history how the Dames beat the Squires in the year 1947. I can hear my grandchildren talking about it."

"Look, goons," Wilson shouted "No matter what those chicks have plotted, we'll come out the winnahs!"

The boys looked at him and he continued, "We're gonna dress like grandpa dressed—in tails!"

"Yeah?" the boys echoed.

"Yeah. Now everybody rummage in attics and trunks. Those who can't find tails—well—we'll rent some from the undertakers."

The boys cheered and carried Wilson on their shoulders. Again he was the hero. The fathers of the boys now had a secret from the mothers. The undertakers were sworn to secrecy.

On the night of the dance, everyone was excited. Determined-looking girls hurried to the gym right after dinner. They didn't turn on the lights. Boys, draped in long raincoats, gathered on the steps. Mothers and fathers were at the windows, waiting for the last round of the battle.

As the town hall clock struck eight, the lights went on and Ann opened the door. "Come in, boys," she greeted them.

The boys stared. Wilson stepped in. What they saw was a circle of girls dressed in slacks, dungarees, old sweaters, sweat shirts. Scarves were around their heads and they had on old saddle shoes and colored socks.

"Slacks!" Wilson whistled. "So that's it!"

"Yes, for posterity's sake," she told him sweetly.

He turned to the boys. "Off with the capes, Squires. Enter!"

The boys slipped off their long raincoats. The light from the gym shone on stiff white fronts; long tails (some green with age); tight, sagging, and striped trousers; gardenias in buttonholes; white gloves. They walked in solemnly, to the accompaniment of loud guffaws from the windows. Without a word they formed a line and did a snake dance around the gym. The girls looked a little sick.

Ann stepped up to Wilson. "It's our move, sir! Pardon us for a moment. Before the moths destroy all of you, we'll be back."

The girls turned and followed Ann to the locker room.

A short time later, the girls appeared in their long frocks, as pretty as a chorus from a musical on Broadway. The boys had to grin. Each one was looking at his date.

Wilson spoke first. "You all look beautiful. Music!" he shouted to the orchestra. Then he walked up to Shirley and took her hand. "Shall we dance?"

The others followed and soon the gym was a sight not seen in Tuckerville for half a century.

Each Dame whispered to her Squire, "Don't tell anyone, but we think you won."

"Oh no," each boy answered as gallantly as he looked. "You did!"
